Two little boys were visiting their grandfather when they saw his telescope on a shelf. "Oh, look," cried Ben, picking it up, "it makes everything look much larger!" Charlie took it and peered through the other end. "No it doesn't," he said indignantly. "It makes things smaller!" Fortunately their grandfather was on hand to explain and to settle the dispute but nevertheless, that story did set me thinking. How often, I wonder, do quarrels spring up simply because those involved are convinced that only they have the correct way of looking at things? Next time we feel like that, perhaps we should remember that very often another person's perspective can be just as valid as our own!
