FLOWERS have long been associated with expressions of affection towards another person in times of illness or sorrow, or in times of great joy such as weddings. In the language of flowers, many blooms have a special meaning.

In Victorian times, ladies were particularly conscious of this. A circular bridal bouquet of all-white flowers was popular, and each fragrant head in it was included for its own special significance. Roses, symbolising faithfulness and enduring love, were considered essential: "They that would have beautiful roses in their gardens must have beautiful roses in their hearts."

Orange blossom for chastity and purity, and the lily of the valley symbolising "a return of happiness", were also part of the bouquet: as were sweetly-scented carnations, gardenias and waxy trumpets of stephanotis. The outer and final layer was usually of myrtle with its fragrant flowers and leaves, for that symbolised the evergreen eternal love that ought to distinguish marriage.
